“ In 2002, I contributed “A Pair of Gloves” to a collection of teacher stories titled “From Dubs to Marbles”. After it was published, I sent Mrs. Sheward a copy of the book. She responded with a warm thank you note. Mrs. Sheward passed on this past week and so I fondly remember her.

Nestled in tissue paper, a pair of white gloves with pearl button clasps lay in the box. “These are to remind you of who you will be,” said Mary Jo Sheward, the giver of the gift to celebrate my eighth grade graduation. The middle school science teacher continued, “Always remember to be a charming, gracious, stylish lady. Live up to your potential and change the world.” I was delighted with the gloves and her sentiments.

I had never actually been an assigned student in her class, but Mrs. Sheward took an interest in me from our first meeting when I was in seventh grade. I think Mrs. Sheward was attracted by the challenge of shaping my potential. She never failed to chat with me in the hall or offer a shoulder for me to cry on. I was a gangly, klutzy tomboy that had charmed my way into being elected student council president. I was at the top of my class academically and often bored. Mrs. Sheward found ways to challenge me and gave me special projects to expand my horizons. In my insecurity, I could be loud, arrogant, and precocious. But Mrs. Sheward saw through all of that to the woman I would become.

Many times over the years, I thought of the gloves and Mrs. Sheward’s belief in me. As I struggled to gain my confidence as a teacher, I vowed to mimic her way of making students feel special by listening and giving value to their thoughts. Building positive relationships with students became the cornerstone of my practice. Countless times when my job would seem overwhelming and I was ready to quit, I would recall her words and be reminded of many teachers who weathered the same type of storms to influence me. Often as I needed patience or strength with my students, I would imagine putting on the white gloves and living up to Mrs. Sheward’s expectations. I looked for my students’ potential and helped them to recognize it.

Recently, I was busy assisting at a wedding when Mrs. Sheward unexpectedly arrived as a guest. When I could talk with her at the reception, she remembered exactly who I was. She was thrilled to know that I was now a school administrator and had just started creating a program to encourage high school students to become teachers. She had always recognized that I had a “special spark” and began to energize me for my new role. We parted with the plan that she would come to my classroom and model the role of a great teacher.

Thank you Mary Jo Sheward for an elegant gift from a loving heart that continues to empower me to this day. Although the actual gloves long ago disintegrated from wear, their softness still caresses my life and the futures of my students.
